A research-based exploration and natural antidote to The Wisdom of Crowds? of how the decisions we make as individuals are largely based on the unconscious influence of those around us

Did you know that your IQ is constantly changing in response to the people around you, or that there is a biological basis for the flow of false information on Facebook and Twitter? Are you aware that financial traders who can easily read emotional expressions are more likely to “ride” market bubbles—or that other people’s preferences guide most of the decisions we make?

Research shows that most people perceive themselves to be individualistic thinkers. In fact, the majority see themselves as more independent than their peers, which, of course, is impossible. Since social influence is automatic and often works under the radar, we are unaware that many decisions; from the names we give our children to the projects we take on at work, are largely based on the unconscious influence of those around us. Sharot will unveil the hidden power of social learning, good and bad, and will enable us to identify instances in which we fall prey to delusions. The book will search deep below the surface, relying on the latest research in neuroscience and psychology to provide new insight into human behavior.
